

An epidemic is a sudden, unexpected spike in the number of disease cases in a specific community or region. It occurs when an illness spreads rapidly among a large number of people, substantially exceeding the normal "baseline" or expected rate for that exact area.